Artwork by, and for, the Brokenhearted

On Valentine's Day, a Brooklyn exhibition offered creative solace to the recently single.

WHERE DO BROKEN HEARTS GO ON VALENTINE'S DAY? Or any day, for that matter? While romantics across the city were presumably holding hands over meals and in auras of everlasting romance or momified.Includeize your best efforts, more than 100 people took refuge in the Alchemy Collection of the Brooklyn Museum, where the works are divided into three categories: lost love, heartbreak, and loneliness.

The exhibition, which runs through March 14, is called "The Brokenhearted," and it features more than 100 works by artists from around the world. The pieces range from paintings and drawings to sculptures and installations, and they are arranged in a way that reflects the emotions of the artists who created them. "It's a place for people to express their feelings and to connect with others who are going through similar experiences," said one of the curators. "It's a space for healing and for finding hope."